

The UK will spend money on local transport in cities and towns like Sunderland and Solihull to improve the country.

The money will help buses, trams, and trains. This makes travel easier for everyone, not just some places.

The Chancellor said money will help South Yorkshire and the North East with new projects like Metro and tram improvements.

Cities like Greater Manchester and West Yorkshire will get new tram stops and better buses, making travel quicker and more reliable.

The government will check how they spend money to make sure all parts of the UK get a fair chance.

People say this investment is important. It will help local businesses and create jobs. It will also make sure that every region can grow and do well.

The government will soon share more about their plan to make the UK better for everyone.
