

A wooden box from Zambia with old writing called Sona is popular online. It shows African people had their own way to read and write.

The Women's History Museum in Zambia shares online stories about women's roles in history to revive traditions and highlight their importance.

Old items from Zambia, like leather cloaks and tools, were taken and stored in faraway museums. They tell stories of past life and work.

People from other countries collected Zambian items. The museum founders were surprised to find many of these items in places like Sweden.

The museum talks to people in Zambia to learn about the items' history and share it.

This work helps people feel proud of their past and learn about women's important roles in their culture.
