

Old tunnels in London might become a spy museum. They were used in World War II and might have inspired James Bond books.

The new museum will show military gear, have fun displays, and a bar. It opens in 2028 and hopes to get lots of visitors.

The tunnels were for safety in war, then a phone exchange in the 1950s, and used by British Telecom in the 1980s.

The museum shares stories about the Battle of Britain, the cold war, and more. It shows how people kept Britain safe.
