

Scientists use freeze-dried poo pills to fight superbug infections. Good bacteria in the pills help remove superbugs that resist antibiotics.

Superbugs are germs that don't die with medicine. This happens when medicine is used too much. It makes infections hard to treat.

A poo transplant uses healthy poo in a pill to help people with superbug infections. The good bacteria in the pill help fight the bad germs.