

Miriam Haley spoke out against Harvey Weinstein, saying he hurt her in 2006. She decided to testify again after his past conviction was changed.

Miriam spoke in the second trial. Weinstein was found guilty of hurting her. He was not guilty for another woman, and the third is still undecided.

Miriam had to tell her story again in court. She said it was hard and made her feel upset. But she wanted to stand up for herself and other women.

Weinstein said he did not do it and that the women were friends who agreed to be with him. Miriam said this was not true and was hurt by his words.

Miriam's story helped other women speak up. She got support messages. Talking about it raised awareness of sexual violence.

Miriam feels happy for speaking up for the truth. She calls it a "small victory" for justice.
