

Asha and Jason bought a caravan hoping for rental income. They had to sell it back at a loss and felt pressured by a worrying phone call.

People complained about holiday parks. Sales staff gave false promises, and people felt forced to sell caravans for less money.

The Rosses learned the old owner of the caravan didn't die. Paul Gordon also sold his caravan for much less money.

Holiday parks can change fees or rules easily. Many people don't read contracts closely, which can cause problems later.

The Thompsons had to sell their caravan for less due to high fees. They felt stressed and bullied by the park.

Another owner, Mrs Vincent, sold her lodge for much less than it was later advertised for. She felt upset by the big difference in price.

The NCC says to research and read contracts well. The industry is tough, with parks making money from selling caravans.