

In Ballymena, a protest became violent. Many police were hurt, and families felt scared. Police called it "racist thuggery."

The protest turned bad. Masked youths attacked police and houses. Social media spread the news fast. People filmed instead of helping.

Street violence in Northern Ireland is common. It used to be about parades or bonfires, now it's about race. No proof of paramilitary groups involved.

Leaders want peace and say violence is wrong. Social media shares both bad and good messages, but many call for calm and peace.
