

Two school attacks happened in Austria and France. People are shocked. Both countries are finding out why and how to stop it.

In France, a 14-year-old boy hurt a school helper with a knife after being told off for kissing his girlfriend. People worry about his mental health.

In Austria, a 21-year-old used guns to hurt students and a teacher. People want to change gun laws and help lonely young people.

The French government wants to make schools safer. They might ban social media for young people and stop selling knives to children.

Both countries want more doctors and psychologists in schools to help young people who feel alone or troubled.

People are sad and worried about attacks. They want changes to stop them. Governments are listening and thinking about what to do next.
